

I experienced this exact same inconvenience when satellite television first came out years ago. Back then, local television stations and cable conglomerates thought they might lose a few dollars over it so they took out on the consumers and made it quite difficult for the consumer. Finally, somebody at the federal level got a clue and everything seems to be okay with everybody's checkbook ever since.

So, my question to you is this-why can't big corporations just embrace new technology and let the consumers be happy for once? XM Satellite is providing a valuable service just like Direct TV and Dish Network. In fact, if it weren't for those two aforementioned companies, I would be trapped in my own private hell listening to Fiesta Mexicana music in El Paso, Texas. Therefore, I implore you to not permit corporate greed to dictate what the consumers can or cannot obtain in their own home or vehicle. I have fought for that right in two wars now and the last time I checked this was still America. Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,
William Mote
